There are still some restrictions and flatness in the classics of design. Unfortunately some people are still trying to knock off the franchise of fun, games and solutions. There are still some pioneers out there who are trying to tame the beast of entertainment. Some people try to destroy the values, dreams, ideologies and beliefs of the game making process. I doubt we'll see any new approaches in 20 years. What we can see are the efforts and efforts of ten different games with completely different styles, game mechanics and story ideas. While we are not discussing the technical aspects of it, the games might seem a bit boring to you. While a few of them might be very interesting in their own, others are nothing more than a first-person shooter or combat simulator. 1) FreeSpace (1997) This was the first space-based, real-time strategic strategy game, emphasizing on starship battles. While action games are usually pretty boring and short, it seemed to be more like a new-age-version of Star Trek. You had to plan your route and type of tactics for your ship, firing the autocannons, particle cannons
