Androgen ablation therapy is one of the most frequently used treatments for prostate cancer, but eventually such therapy results in treatment resistance, progression of the disease, and increased morbidity and mortality. Unfortunately, the currently available therapies for prostate cancer have modest efficacy and can produce profound side effects. One of the most promising areas for the treatment of prostate cancer is inhibition of androgen receptor (AR) activity. AR is the primary mediator of androgen function in prostate cancer, and it is a critical regulator of cell proliferation. A number of structural features of AR are critical for its normal function and activation (see, e.g., deKemp et al., J. Biol. Chem. 272: 28264 (1997); Morris, J. Endocrinol. 143: 273 (1996); Reddy, J. Mol. Med. 77: 467 (1999); Lagarde et al., J. Biol. Chem. 274: 19153 (1999); and Carr et al., Eur. J. Biochem. 268: 1101 (2001)). For example, AR is a member of the nuclear hormone receptor superfamily. Upon ligand-induced activation, AR hetero-dimerizes with other nuclear hormone receptors, such as estrogen receptors, progesterone receptors, thyroid receptors, vitamin D receptors, and peroxisome proliferator-activated receptors. This "dimer" conformation of AR is critical for activation of the receptor
