How strongly does perturbation spread during individual evolution? Phenotypic evolution can lead to stabilizing selection, which can explain the maintenance of polymorphisms in natural populations. In such a case, the evolutionary dynamics of the most fit genotypes are driven by interlocus and interallele interactions, which are shaped by the mutational environment of the population and thus by the forces of natural selection. Here, we study the dynamics of polymorphisms by assuming that selection is weak and study the evolution of a single character, through direct and indirect selection. We show that, under weak selection, the evolution of a population is not deterministic, but the polymorphism is the result of a coevolutionary process between two genotypes. In our stochastic model, the behavior of the most fit genotype depends on the mutational parameter α and whether the dynamics are direct or indirect. Both effects increase the likelihood that a given genotype becomes fixed. We then explore how α affects the effect of variation in selection and discuss the conditions under which such an effect is likely to be observed. The global spread and the continuing evolution of new pathogenic viruses may lead to the appearance of new diseases. New, yet-to-be diagnosed diseases are inevitable. Understanding the modes of clinical transmission of these diseases is of great importance for health care providers. Due to the easy exposure of health care providers, nurses and physicians, the nurse is at an increased risk of infection. Professional standards concerning cleanliness and infection control measures should be adhered to, and this should be expected of all health care professionals and students.
