This is the phrase that for the past couple of months has accompanied me as I have made great progress by adding deliberate self-care to my life. It is not that I was not intentional about the aforementioned. I was. But, to a degree, I didn't want to take the time to actually make those changes, so the deliberate self-care remained on the back burner. This past weekend I had a conversation with a dear friend who was talking about making a change in her life. She had gone through some adversity (the loss of a loved one) and that experience changed her perspective. She wanted to make the choice to be a better person. But, she was having a hard time making the decision. The decision that she made was to establish new boundaries, rules, and accountability. She was sincere in her desire to make a change. What she was having trouble with was making that change. Not because she lacked intention; she did. She had intentions to put herself first, to eat better, to exercise. She simply did not know how to do it. On this morning's call, she shared that, before she moved to Charleston, she had made a similar decision to try to incorporate better time management and setting aside time for herself. That decision did not turn out the way she had hoped either. For one, she allowed things to get away from her (i.e. discipline was needed to maintain focus). And, secondly, she was having a hard time sticking to her boundaries. Her question for me was, ♦

Known examples of the above-described light-emitting element includes a light-emitting element whose light emitting layer is made of an organic compound material (for example, see Patent Document 1 and Patent Document 2). An organic compound material is an excellent material for a light-emitting layer of a light-emitting element because the material can be deposited by a vacuum deposition method, sputtering, or the like. Further, an organic compound material has advantages including that the material is relatively cheap and provides a high degree of design freedom because materials can be selected from a wide variety of compounds. Arsenic-induced apoptosis in NCB-20 human large cell lymphoma cells is mediated by the BH3-only protein Bik and the p53 tumor suppressor.

Arsenic (As) is a well-known human carcinogen and causes a high incidence of mortality and cancer in the southeast Asian population. In experimental animals, exposure to As causes lymphomas. The molecular mechanisms of As-induced lymphomas are not known. The present study describes for the first time the gene expression profile of the large cell lymphoma cell line NCB-20 in response to As exposure. In this study we explored the role of the apoptotic pathway in the response of NCB-20 cells to As. Using cDNA microarrays we examined the expression profile of apoptosis genes in NCB-20 cells treated with As. In addition to a direct role of As in the induction of apoptosis, this study demonstrated that the BH3-only protein Bik is involved in this event. Expression of the tumor suppressor protein p53 was also shown to be increased in As-treated cells. Knock-down of either Bik or p53 gene expression sensitized NCB-20 cells to As-induced apoptosis suggesting that both of these genes might be important mediators in the apoptotic response. This is the
