Optical Flares-Pro-Presets + TutorialsWhen we think of the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and rules governing its operation, we often think of the obstacles that prevent new drugs and medical devices from reaching the American public. The FDA is the main reason why many drugs never get to market. It acts to control what doctors, hospitals, and insurance companies can do in their treatment decisions. Unfortunately, these rules have some unintended consequences, and they could seriously limit the quality of cancer care in the United States. In its recent analysis of the FDA's cancer rules, the Institute for Clinical and Economic Review (ICER) found that the current rules could reduce the quality of cancer care, even if compliance is spotty. In order for these rules to work well, compliance requires that oncology practices or hospitals employ administrative resources to track the information used to make the various decisions about therapies and pay for them. However, the requirement that doctors or hospitals have such administrative staff on staff means that the best providers, those who use the information most accurately and efficiently, will have to divert valuable resources. With the relentless increase of Medicare spending, oncology practices and the hospitals that treat cancer patients have become major purchasers of care. If the FDA's cancer rules reduce the quality of cancer care because they divert administrative resources from clinical care, a potentially unsustainable situation has been created. And it's not just that the best providers will experience a reduction in the quality of their services. Over time the best providers may be forced out of the market, and that will reduce the access to cancer treatment for all Medicare beneficiaries. Fortunately, there is a way to eliminate the quality gap created by our current system. The FDA rules can be improved by passing legislation that uses more financial incentives and less regulatory oversight. We need more choices for Medicare beneficiaries that will enable them to choose from the best providers, regardless of where they live, how much it costs, or whether they are in network or out of network.
